Who is the protagonist?

Jake— a tech-savvy, introverted 15-year-old who prefers the glow of his computer screen to the unpredictable chaos of real life. Jake overthinks every decision, always calculating risks before acting, so the MirrorMind app's "certainty" feels like a dream come true — until it starts making choices for Jake. His dry sense of humor and sharp logic become both a strength and a curse as Jake wrestles with the fear of losing control over his own life. The question is: will he outsmart the app, or will his fear of an unknown future keep him trapped in its grip?

Where does the story take place?

In a futuristic city.

What is the plot of the story?

A new app, MirrorMind, claims to predict your future — not through vague horoscopes, but with chilling accuracy. At first, it seems harmless — predicting pop quizzes and surprise visits from your parents — until it starts offering cryptic warnings about events you desperately want to avoid. Then, the app begins sending you personalized choices: meet your crush at the library or miss the chance forever; save your best friend from danger or risk losing their trust. The question looms — is MirrorMind helping you shape your destiny, or trapping you in someone else's game?

Is there a theme to the story?

At its heart, this story grapples with the fear of an unpredictable future and the temptation of control. Jae's struggle with the MirrorMind app mirrors the teenage experience of craving certainty — in school, relationships, and life paths. The theme questions: Is knowing the future a gift or a curse? And can you ever truly be free if you're obsessed with controlling what comes next?
